A judge in settling interrogatories annexed to a commission has some power to determine what interrogatories may be annexed and their form. 9 Abb. Pr. 178. He can not deny or curtail the right of either party to insert any question pertinent to the issue which he proposes. He has authority to disallow questions not pertinent to the issue, and hence to determiue whether a proposed question is pertinent or not; this power should be sparingly exercised, as he can not always foresee precisely what evidence the exigencies of the trial may render proper, and as the statute reserves to either party the i ight to make at the trial any objection to questions or answers which he...
