In the month of May last, I saw this whole population bearing every mark of hunger in their debilitated frames. I knew that the means of subsistence did not exist in the country, and I did not conceive it possible that relief could be administered either in time or in quantity, sufficient to save numbers from perishing; but I have now the happiness of seeing those very people in the full vigour of strength, and without, to my knowledge, the loss of one single life from want of food. The promptitude with which the people of England answered the call of charity, and the celerity with which your Committee organised the distribution of the funds to the most distant..
