RareBooksClub. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 54 pages. OCLC Number: (OCoLC)54793966 Subject: Bioterrorism -- Prevention -- Technological innovations -- United States. Excerpt: . . . as youth a forum for public service, I believe now is the moment that government should throw open its doors to the ideas, the creativity, and the energy of a generation raised on information technologies that is willing to fight the terrorist threat. This hearing is going to explore opportunities to respond to the threat of bioterrorism in particular. Our country has begun to mobilize its public sector, government, military, and law enforcement to fight terrorism. Analyzing the events of September 11, this Subcommittee found the private sector was ready and willing to contribute, but found too many obstacles. Some could not get proper credentials to get into the disaster site. Some simply could not find the right place to offer their people, their expertise, and their equipment. In the event of a bioterror attack, it appears many communities are going to face the same confusion. Right now, if a town is hit with a biological agent and looking for the closest medical authority, in most cases, there is no comprehensive list of certified experts available locally to assist. Where do those local leaders turn to find help nearby Where can doctors, scientists, and technology experts go to offer their aid Most do not know, and right now the Federal Government has few clear answers. At least 20 Federal agencies are charged with some part of fighting the bioterror threat. In the State of the Union address, the President said he would not wait on a fence while dangers gather around the public. I agree. America must marshal the efforts of technology experts and entrepreneurs, top scientists and medical...
