This quantity of heat corresponds to over 10, 000.000 foot-pounds of work. Horse power being considered as corresponding to 550 foot-pounds per second or 33, 000 per minute and 1,980, 000 foot-pounds per hour, the pound of coal, it will be seen, contains an energy which, if capable of being completely converted into work without loss, would in one hour be equal to 5 horse power. One of the greatest problems of applied science at present is the conversion of the whole of this latent energy of the coal into a quantity of useful effect approximating to the mechanical, equivalent. Q.--What are the different kinds of heat? A.--There are three kinds of heat--Latent heat, Sensible heat, and Total heat. By Latent heat is meant the heat which expends itself in changing the nature of a body such as turning ice into water or water into steam. Maxwell defines it as the quantity of heat which must be communicated to a unit mass of a body in a given state in order to convert it into another state without changing its temperature. By Sensible heat is meant the heat that affects the Thermometer or makes a body sensibly warmer. Sir Wm. Thompson explains the difference between Sensible and Latent heat thus, Heat given to a substance and warming it is said to be sensible in the substance, but heat given to a substance and not warming it is said...
