Excerpt: . . . finger and the thumb-Thff noteworthy feature about the hand movement of this Writer 15 the lack of good co-ordination between the movements Of the fingers and the arm, and this lack of co-ordination is favored by the extreme side position in which the hand rests on the table. In the speed curve (Fig. 24) we find a marked contrast between this subject and the good writers. The writing is not divided to correspond to the strokes or natural combinations of strokes in the letters. The individual strokes themselves are not made uniformly with acceleration toward the middle, which is what we should naturally expect and find in the better co-ordinated writing. FIG. 23b. --Hand position and gross movement of a poor writer from Grade II At the very first stroke, for instance, there is a pause near the beginning, but no pause at the...
